Commodore's Report

Rx for Wx

Well here we are, Valentine's season and it's still not particularly tempting to get back out on the water except for the truly hearty, seasoned veterans in the club. I've been pondering the best prescription for, shall we say, marginal PNW weather.

One obvious choice is to clear out of town for a while. Preferably in a southerly direction. Hard to do if you have a day job, although not a bad use of a vacation week. On the other hand, vacation weeks become downright precious when cruising season arrives. For the retired folks schedules tend to be simpler and a few weeks in southern climes are more constrained by $$$$ and health issues. It's not a perfect world.

Boat preparation and cruise planning are taking up some of the slack time for me. I just finished studying the ABYC Marine Electrical Certification study guide and took all the quizzes. Learned a lot for that effort. Maybe it will come in handy someday.

While I'm otherwise busy lounging around eating Oreos, we have at least one club member who plays pickle ball almost every day. A true inspiration. We should all probably be moving around more in the winter. It's been a terrible ski season so far, so that's out. Let's see.....how about we all get out for a night of bowling? Most of us haven't done that in years. Might be a real hoot. I'll try to set something up in March. I'll bring the Oreos.

In the meantime, keep smiling and get ready for another beautiful summer in Bellingham and a full slate of events at the Club.

Todd will be discussing the research and writing of Shipyard, which covers historical shipyards and boat builders in Whatcom County. He will focus on the yachting section as well. Yes, he will have books for sale at $40 cash or check, no additional tax.

Thanks to Lorretta Palagi for suggesting Todd! I did listen to one of his podcasts and found him to be a very interesting speaker. Please plan to attend our February meeting and bring a guest.

December's King Tides

By Lorretta Palagi

You might have heard on the news or, if you were anywhere near Squalicum Harbor in December, you might have noticed that we were having our king tides. Here's a shot taken on December 18, around 1000 when the tide was predicted at 9.41 feet. Don't see that very often!

Deer Harbor Cruise Update

By Phil Terzian

The Deer Harbor cruise this year is scheduled to run from Thursday, June 20, until Saturday June 22. Last year a few folks stayed until June 23. I have selected these dates because that is most likely to be the spot prawn fishing opener and the fishing is particularly good around Deer Harbor.

Last year we had a small group but had a lot of fun. Some came on the ferry and stayed in local lodging, some by boat. The fishing was great, Rob Wells joined us on Joyful. Of course, this led to some excellent fresh seafood at the potluck.

Deer Harbor is one of my favorite marinas in the islands. It's big enough to have full services and two very good restaurants, but small enough to avoid a lot of frenzied craziness.

You can make a reservation through the Dockwa app. Be sure to include a note on there saying that you are part of the SYC group. We will all receive moorage discount if we have more than six boats. If you have any questions you can contact the harbormaster, Marc Broman, at 360-376-3037

Cruise hosts this year are Phil, Jodi, Nico and Megan.

WELCOMING WALT & PEGGY SOUZA

By Joyce Glenn

Walt and Peggy officially joined Squalicum Yacht Club in June 2023, after being guests of David & Celie's at one of our spring meetings. They have a 40' Bayliner named Carmen E. and are dockmates of David & Celie at Gate 6. They currently boat, fish and crab primarily in the San Juan Islands but look forward to going further north in the future.

I was recently chatting with Walt and found out we were at Bellingham High School at the same time, I was in class of '72 and Walt in the class of '73. He also worked for Alvord Richardson in the mid-70s and worked with my brother. Small world! Born in Oregon, Walt moved to Bellingham when he was 1 year old, so probably qualifies as a "Bellinghamster." Peggy was born in Seattle and they met in Bellingham through a mutual friend. He worked at Uniflite which Chris Craft bought out after Uniflite burned. They're looking forward to retirement in the near future.

(Souzas cont'd)

They have a 23-year-old daughter who is pursuing a career in opera. She was a Bellingham Showstopper and had most likely performed at SYC during her high school days. She has been invited to sing the National Anthem at the BYC Opening Day festivities this year. Let's all hope for a sunny day so we can hear her from our Benefit Breakfast. We also chatted about the three most prevalent yacht clubs in Bellingham, and both agreed SYC was the best fit! Let's give them a warm welcome and just remember that when you sit down and really chat with someone you are likely to find your paths have crossed somewhere along the line. Welcome Walt & Peggy!

Solo

By Jack Bazhaw

My first start-to-finish solo sailing trip of any length was to Sucia Island. My friend George, from Anacortes, had suggested we get together over the weekend. Up until this point, my solo travel had been no further than the seven miles to Inati or Chuckanut Bay.

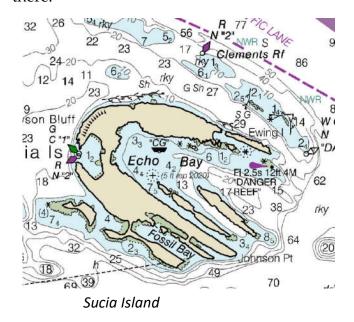

The trip to Sucia was uneventful, under light rain and a slight north wind. I anchored in Echo Bay near the Coast Guard buoy. Shortly after anchoring the wind shifted to the south. Vancouver Weather was now predicting heavy southerly winds. George did not show up as scheduled. George never showed up because he did better weather checking than I did and found out there was a storm coming in.

Having spent some uncomfortable times here in a southerly, I decided to head to Shallow Bay on the north side. My path was up the east side of Sucia between the island and Clements and Danger Reef. Having not been this way before I spent a lot of time on the trip looking at my chart.

The buoys on Shallow were all taken so I anchored and proceeded to fix myself a fine salmon steak dinner. When it was dark, I could see the anchor lights in Echo gyrating around, so I patted myself on the back for avoiding an unpleasant evening.

Then at Oh-dark-thirty I was awakened by a loud noise. The boat was jumping and heaving and through a port I could see I was yawing very close to the boat on a buoy on my port side. I was afraid the noise I had heard was from hitting him. A strong wind was now from the northwest, putting me on a lee shore; I could just make out big waves coming into the bay.

Time to get out of Dodge. I dressed and tried starting the engine. Three times and it would not crank. Okay, think. I must be pressing the stop button and not the start button. With the engine finally going, I turned on the navigation lights and the foredeck light and went forward to recover the anchor. As I got to the foredeck I stepped on the acrylic hatch, slippery as black ice in the rain, and launched myself into the air coming down on my back. My glasses were gone! At that point in my life, before cataract surgery improved my vision, clearly seeing from the cockpit to the bow without them would have been impossible. As I lay there, I felt around and was amazed to find my glasses on the side deck folded up just as though I had placed them there.

Solo (continued)

I recovered the anchor, got back to the cockpit, turned off the deck light, grabbed a flashlight and started for the bay entrance. This was long before powerful LED flashlights; I have simple two-cell lights, but I had recently replaced them with halogen units. The rain on my glasses made everything foggy and distorted but the light was just powerful enough to make out the day markers for the channel entrance.

Now what? Going to port would put me on the west side of the island and again on a lee shore, plus I had no chart to look at, but memory said there were a lot of things to go bump in the night against. To starboard would allow me to retrace my steps from vesterday and the chart I had stared at so much was still fresh in my mind. I turned to starboard hopefully making enough offing from Sucia and not too close to the reef. The buoy at the north end of Clements reef is unlit and my flashlight never picked it up in the swells. The boat now has a more violent motion as the swells pass under me but at least the anchor locker is no longer scooping water down below (I had forgotten to close the hatch).

At this point I realized that I had not turned on the knot meter, or fathometer. This was also long before I had radar or a chart plotter at the helm. And it was pitch black. No stars or moon visible. The sky was just slightly less black than the island to my starboard, giving me a vague sense of how far away I was. Briefly shining the light at the island helped me from getting too close—I hoped.

After a while, I became aware of liquid in my boots. Did I have a personal problem? Nope, the rain had saturated my float coat and was working its way down.

Then I thought I had lost sight of Sucia. I had forgotten that the south end is much lower elevation. When I came to the break between Sucia and Ewing Island I felt better and on target. I tried to find the buoy at the south end of the reef on my port with no luck. I finally decided I was far enough south to turn; phooey on finding the reef buoy. But now I was going into the wind and, being soaked, it was very cold. I could see some anchor lights in Echo and amazingly my flashlight picked up the day marker on the reef at the south end (now a light). When I went to deploy the anchor, I wanted my trusty flashlight, but it had disappeared, lost overboard. I could see an anchor light in Shallow Bay gyrating like crazy.

After anchoring, I went below where it is warmer but wet; the only dry spot is the head. I stripped, dried off, put on some dry long johns kept in plastic bags and climbed into a slightly damp sleeping bag. The next thing I knew was its afternoon, the sun was out, and the wind had abated. It was a pleasant motor
